The Gospels are full of food stories and people eating together. You've got 5,000 families sitting down to share five loaves of bread and two fish, and TAHDAAH you've got yourself a miracle. Jesus ate with all kinds of folks who were used to being on the outside. He invited them to pull up their chairs, sit right next to him, and chow down. I'd call that another miracle. The Acts of the Apostles describes about how after Jesus was resurrected, his followers shared everything in common – especially food. The church still knows how to feed people. Every Sunday after worship I go downstairs and eat dessert before I go home and eat lunch. There's lots of ways to feed people, though. Listening to someone when she needs to talk can fill her right up. Or how about playing a game? I can't make small talk to save my life, but hand me a deck of cards and it's off to the races! On Thursday, Sixth Street will feed the community first with salad and later with the money it raises. But Saturday 6-9pm, we'll feed people on Euchre and Bingo and Chutes and Ladders (wait, what?). Consider this your invitation to be fed twice this week.
